REVIEW.

The textile trade is probably indebted to the labour of a number of ingenious men for the advances we have recently witnessed in the art of printing. A number of new designs and styles of stencils have been brought into use, and the same careful attention which is devoted to embroidery is now extended to the printing of textiles. The result is a great improvement in the quality of the goods produced, and the consumer is benefited by the increased variety and beauty of the designs offered. The art of printing is no longer confined to the production of simple designs, but the more intricate and elaborate patterns are now being produced with great skill and care. The use of color is also becoming more widespread, and the results are often admirable. The progress of the art is well illustrated in the exhibition of recent designs and patterns, which are now being shown at the principal textile fairs and exhibitions. The success of these efforts is evidenced by the increase in the sale of printed textiles, and the demand for new and original designs continues to grow. The future of the art looks promising, and it is to be hoped that the greater attention which is now being paid to it will be continued and extended.
